Description

A mahogany round Occasional Table made to dismantle.

This is a known design and although it could be argued that the design is constructional as opposed to being purposely made to dismantle, no glue has been used to strengthen the screw joints.

The top has a bracing bar to its underside with a threaded hole to the centre to receive the screw to the top of the table's turned column. The bottom of the column is also threaded to screw into a hole to the centre of the base. A shaped disc, with an upturned edge, sits between the bottom of the column and the base to give the join a neater finish. Three low bun feet are screwed to the bottom of the base for the table to stand on.

The top is made of two pieces of timber and there is evidence to its underside that it was once strengthen before a better job was done. If the column is examined carefully, it can also be seen that the diameter of wood used to turn it was very slightly too small as there is a small flat area on one side at its widest point.

This size of table is always useful for a lamp or to go by the side of a chair. Circa 1835.

The chair in the final photo is sold separately.
